Overseas Club Sends $4000 Worth of Tobacco to Men "Over There" Every Week-Nancy Wynne Has Various Things to Say

REALLY, the quiet way in which the Coverseas Club works and gets there is marvelous, isn't it? My dears, do you know that that bunch of energetic women have undertaken to send Gave given the have undertaken to send Gave given the and it is being carried out, too!

In Lansdowne, Her guests were Mrs. William Davis, Mrs. Prank J. McNeive, Mrs. Charles J. Pilling, Mrs. Robert W. Gick, Mrs. Charles Mercor Bailey, Mrs. Emilin C. Paul, Mrs. Robert Lynne Mishler, Mrs. Charles Parker Boyd, Mrs. A. F. O'Daniel and Mrs. Harry L. Henry. $1000 worth of tobacco a week to our men "over there?" And that's only Phila! delphia, mind you. Why I think it is simply wonderful that in the various interests they have undertaken to make money for the fund, they have raised enough to put such orders through. I take pride in saying that we are remarkable for this work. Indeed in proportion to population and money in this city we are well in the lead in our Emergency Ald work. and the Overseas Club is, as you know, a branch of the Emergency Aid. Five years ago if I had been told that these omen who are the youl and backbone of all these good works would give up their time from 9 until 5 o'clock nearly every day of their lives, either at the Emergency Aid headquarters, the Red Cross, the Overseas Club, the Navy League. the various relief committees, the Motor Messenger headquarters and all the other works, I would not have believed it. No. because five years ago they did not have to think of anything but clothes and balls, and dinners and partners in the social world. But now very few care if they have new gowns, and most think it better not to buy them anyhow, because that money could be so well used for the Red Cross or the poor Serbians or Armenians.

SPEAKING of the Emergency Ald, did you know that the Music and Wig has promised to give the proceeds of its Haster week's performance to certain designnated committees of the Emergency Aid? That is great, too, isn't it?

ISN'T it awful how careful one has to be in front of the kiddles?

They are so small you don't realize how they pick things up and mimic. This was evidently the case the other day with a certain young father that you know and I know. He had a bad cold and stayed home for several days. Now, this young father had a small daughter aged two years and about two months to be exact, and also in the farrily there was a small dog, whom the daughter was wont to pull round with her in her various avocations. While father was home he heard "small dog" bark in the distance, and, forgetting that "small daugh ter" was on the floor in the room with him, he sweetly remarked, "Where is that damn pup?"

No one answered, and so all was well, till about five minutes later, when pupple was heard loping along the hall, "Daddy." said daughter. Daddy, see-damn pup?"

MHE women of the Navy League are going to hold a big bazaar for the sale of lamp shades and knitting bags at the Ritz-Carlton on April 1, I'm told, for their free wool fund. There are so many volunteers for work these days it's almost impossible to provide enough woo! for those who are willing and anxious to work, but cannot afford to buy worsted to THEAR Alden Lee was able to get a short furlough after all, though he is now back on his ship. He and Edith, however. had a little wedding trip, if it was a belated one. Edith is going South to join the Lillies for a while. To me this marrying and then having to leave one's husband or wife in a few days seems infinitely pathetic. And if it is pathetic to me an onlooker, what must be to the poor little principals? However, better have each other a little while than not at all, is their argument, I guess, and I believe I'd do the same thing if the necessity arose. How about it?

BEHIND THE SCENES

With Rulers and Leaders of Wartime Europe By THE PRINCESS RADZIWILL

A Royal Love Story

Copprisht, 1918 THIS is an old, old story. At least, it took I place a few weeks before the war broke out, and this is very long ago, indeed. When occurred people were still of the opinion

Schiller and Gretch-cus with golden hair and blue eyes, walk-ing under linden trees in andent German ellies on wun mer evenings, while a Faust, on conquest bent, was walling somewhere in a dark corner to nesociated with that dead Germany like world shall see no more. At least, it began there, though PRINCUSS RADZIVILLS Its trage end occurred at Heidelberg, the other historic town with its runsed castle, its towers and church spires, that shall no longer attract tourists as they have done in the buried past, which seems now so far away from us all

THE HEROINE

The become was a little princess, who also had solden bair and bittle eyes and who had loned to escape from the tedious life to which she had been here and for which she felt that she was not made. She loved the sun, howeve, bovely dresses, fine jewels, the liberty to go about and to do what she liked with her existence, and she could not resign herself to see it flow in the same even stream in which that of her mother and of all her kindred hid been seent. Her heart hungered after independence and the right to live and love, which was desied to her by the exigencies of her rank.

She was a rebellions little princess, and she was to pay the penalty so sadly and so cruelly, that one cannot help pitying her instead of blanning her, as her royal relatives did when they found themselves faced by a did when they found themselves faced by a scandal such as had never before ruffled the neace of their haughty house. She was a miserable little princess also, so miserable that she lacked the courage to assert herself and to break through the barriers which implicably negotidess had erected all around her and that, finding herself poweriess to fight her way through them, she lay down and died when she had at last convinced herself of the hopelessness of the struggle.

PARENTAL DIFFICULTIES

PARENTAL DIFFICULTIES

This poor girl, whose death caused such a semantion smong all the royal and imperial circles of Germany, was the Princess Sophy of Saxe Welmar, a cousin of the reigning Grand Duke of that name. Her father was a younger selon of the fluistrious house at whose shrine the great Goethe blunself had worshiped, and her mether a Princess of Veenbourg Eudingen. The bluest blood in Europe flowed in her velus and she seemed to be destined to unite herself in marriage with some German prince whose quarterings were as unimpeachable as her own. But, alse, in our matter-of-fact twentieth century it is not enough even for a princess to be able to boast of a long line of famens ancestors to find a suitable husband. Some wealth is also required in order to sustain the dignity of one's tank. And the parents of pretry little Sophy were so badly off in that respect that they had not even heen able to go on living at Weimar and had to retire to the relative obscurity of Heidelberg, where they could at least economize without its being too much noticed.

Prince William of Saxe Weimar had seen a moder to make to a proper time to the cast, who had not the countries of the countr berg, where they could at least economize without his being too much noticed.

Princa William of Saxe Weimar had bought a modest vilia in the old university town, where his high birth made him a completious personage, and secured for him any completious personage, and secured for him any extra expenses he could not very well have incurred. Whenever a ball was given or a reception took place at the louise of some one or other of the few people wimm he condessended to siveny stables in Heidelberg was hired to take him together with his wife to the entertainment. The rest of the time take Princess walked or used, in quite a democratic war, the street cars whenever she visited her friends. A local dressmaker hade her gowns and those of her despiter and the butcher and baker's accounts were often allowed to accumulate to a considerable amount before they were settled with many sighs and grumblings on the part of the Prince. It was a harrow, harassing existence, that was led by the family, one in which the question of noney naived the principal part, and in which the children were taught before everything clee the necessity to be economical, which, by the way, neither the Princess Sophy nor her two brothers were inclined to accept.

brothers were inclined to accept.

The former was the one upon which this constant want of ready cash told in the most painful manner. Her mother had taken her to Weimar during one or two winter seasons and had even presented her at the Berlin court. But these visits had been the source of much grief to the high-spirited girl, whose pride had suffered so much at finding herself dressed like a housemald, if not worse, beside the sumptious garments of the other tourse principles in whose society she was thrown that she had implored her parents to spare her this ordeal in the future, and had made up her mind to re-

Princess Sophy refurned home broken-hearted, having lost all her illusions, with nothing but dreary prospects before her. She took her brother's revolver and shot intself in her room the same night. The poor little girl with golden hair and bus eves, the sentimental Gretchen who had be-lieved that the Germany and the Welmar of today were still those of Gotthe, paid with her life for her mistake.

A LOVE AFFAIR

The Princess was a woman of placid temperament, and sie was delighted not to be dempelled to take her daughter about. Sie therefore, allowed the latter to do what she pleased, and Sophy took to frequenting some houses in Heidelberg, where perhaps, under different conditions, she would never have set her foot. She met there all kinds a people, principally students of the university, which comprised young men belonging to quite another society than the one in which he was supposed to move.

Among them was the son of the great Barlin banker, Haren von Heichroder, the heir to many millions, and at the same time an attractive and handsome fellow, but of Hebrew origin, which, according to German iteas dispused of any pessibility of his every trius accepted as a husband by the parents of any titled girl. Yet it was with him that Princess Sophy fell in love, and it was he who wisspersed in her ear words of affection, and who suggested to her to try to persuade her father and mother to consent to their marriage. He drew in enasging colors the interpret of the beautiful life she would be able to lead with him: a life where every desire would be at once fulfilled; where all that her heart could wish in the way of owels, pretty gowns, poarls, dismonds, motorcas, lovely houses and spicodor would be put at her disposal.

The girl believed him, and at last picked up sufficient courage to speak to her parents, with the result that she drew upon herreif such a storm of abuse that, in her desperation, she did the very last thing she ought to have attempted. She went to seek her lover at the hotel where we was staying and enterated, him to rim away with her and to hide her somewhere where it would be impossible for her father to find her, but, alasials; for the illusions of little Sophy. The Haron did not care to endanger his position in the world by a romance with a member of the royal house, which he feared might have disagreeable consequences for him. He would have been willing and
